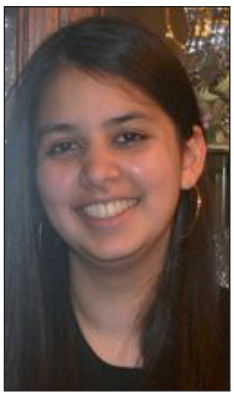
Message from the CEO



Dear Reader,

As I enter the final months of my tenure as CEO of The Triple Helix, I only wish that I had more hours in the day to devote to our initiatives and projects. The wonderful thing about working with motivated, intelligent students is to witness the speed at which simple ideas can be transformed into something tangible, whether it's a new way of tracking where the authors of international feature articles get published, or a novel type of science policy event held at one of our member universities. In my remaining time with TTH, my top priority is to build our capacity to do this on an international scale— it is imperative that our members feel that they are part of a complex, interconnected network of like-minded students with whom they can interact on a regular basis. Once we are able to facilitate regular international collaborations and establish a collective experience for TTHers across the world, we will know our organization has succeeded in fulfilling its mandate as a "global forum for science in society". This is my final project, and I hope the results will enrich the TTH experience for years to come.

Sincerely,
Manisha Bhattacharya
Chief Executive Officer
The Triple Helix, Inc.

The New Face of TTH

Since TTH's inception in 2005, both the print journal and the organization have been continually expanding and evolving at a remarkable rate. As our chapters flourish and our network solidifies, we feel it is the right time to officially establish the stylistic maturity of our publication. As such, the TTH Production Team has taken the time to consciously define and solidify our visual identity so that with this issue, The Triple Helix, Inc. may unveil the new look that will carry the organization into the future.

After asking all chapters for input about how the new design should look, the Central Production Team spent Summer 2008 tirelessly addressing and implementing these comments, until they arrived at the journal you see before you.

This new look will identify our print journal, The Science and Society Review, wherever it may be found, unite all of our chapters across the globe, usher in a new era in TTH history, and establish The Triple Helix as a permanent and professional voice in academic and policy debates across several disciplines. We hope you can feel the difference.

Cover and spread from the Fall 2006 issue of The Science in Society Review.

© 2008, The Triple Helix, Inc. All rights reserved.